If the functionality is really important, the other sites will probably provide it in some way.

But let's suppose some of the operations are not essential.  Then the lack of them is a mere inconvenience.  By contrast, inviting people to do them by running nonfree software is _wrong_, ethically bad.

The purpose of the GNU system is to give users freedom.  This goal is ethical in nature, not technical.  Thus it is natural that we apply our own ethical principles to the question of what software our repositories require people to run.  Recommending nonfree software is a problem of a deeper level than the lack of some convenience.
